MITIARJUK NAPPAALUK (1931–2007)

Mitiarjuk Nappaaluk, recognized for her efforts to preserve Inuit culture and language and as the author of the first novel written in Inuktitut, passed away in the early hours of April 30. She was almost 78.

The eldest daughter of a family with no sons, Nappaaluk was very involved with hunting as well as aspects of family life. She received many honours for her work to preserve Inuit culture, including the 1999 Heritage and Spirituality National Aboriginal Achievement Award, an honorary doctorate from McGill University (2000), and the Order of Canada (2004).

Nappaaluk's work involved much writing, including the first novel written in syllabics, Sanaaq. Begun in her early twenties, the book chronicles the everyday lives and traditions of fictional heroine Sanaaq and the people around her. It also fictionalizes important events, such as the first landing of a plane in Sanaaq's community.

"She struggled all her life to promote proper use of Inuktitut and the knowledge of Inuit culture," said Bernard Saladin d'Anglure, an anthropologist who met Nappaaluk in 1961. He worked to translate her novel into French and to find a publisher. "She had lots of wisdom and audacity, and never hesitated to give her opinion," he said, adding that she was a great educator, artist and writer.

The first version of Sanaaq, published in syllabics, can be found in northern Inuit schools. A French version has since been published, and an English translation may be published as early as this fall.

Nappaaluk was also heard on CBC radio in the North and a film about her life was produced by the Kativik School Board.

HENRY EVALUARDJUK (1923–2007)

Surrounded by his family, Henry Evaluardjuk died of heart failure at his home in Iqaluit May 30. He was 84.

Evaluardjuk was a well-known artist who lived in Igloolik and Pond Inlet. His work has been gifted to many prominent people such as former U.S. president Ronald Reagan and the Queen of England.

According to daughter Suzanne Evaluardjuk, his early life was not easy. His father died during his early teens. Looked after by various family members, "he said it was out of desperation to be independent and self-sustaining that he used his abilities to carve to get on his own two feet," said his daughter.

The skill served him well. Evaluardjuk's carvings, a mix of friendly, lively-looking people and animals, are in the collection of the National Gallery of Canada and the Canadian Museum of Civilization.

Happy to share his skill with the younger generation, Evaluardjuk taught younger hunters about the land and water, and taught his daughter and many other younger carvers how to work with gold and to master "tough and fragile stones."

When Suzanne taught a college jewellery course, her father once came in to meet the students. "His visit ended with good thoughts and encouragement," she recalled. "He told them never to give up hope and, if possible, pick up the skills learned today and use them again later in life. They will always be with you."

Evaluardjuk, who was buried at Pond Inlet, leaves many children and grandchildren.

NUYALIAQ QIMIRPIK (1937–2007)

Nuyaliaq Qimirpik of Kimmirut, who became known for his life-like depictions of muskoxen, died in early June after an accident on the land.

Born in 1937 in a place called Qatuq, Qimirpik moved to Kimmirut in his mid-teens. At 69, the carver remained prominent in his community, whose residents will miss his humour and leadership. He mostly carved animals, but also shamans, if asked. His affinity for muskoxen is interesting as there are none in the area of Kimmirut.

He learned to carve by watching his father, Ooloope Killiktee. Qimirpik's work is included in the collections of the Canadian Museum of Civilization, Quebec's Musée national des beaux-arts and the Winnipeg Art Gallery, among other art organizations.

Carving to support his family, Qimirpik expressed concern in a 1998 interview about what seemed to be a dip in the Inuit art market and how that would affect other Inuit carvers: "I am part of a large number of people that are going through a hard time right now with carving," he said. "I would like to say that carving has to become better exposed to a wider range of people in order to become better known."

Qimirpik is survived by his children and his wife, Nicotai.

Sculpture

Nuyaliaq has no preference for the types of materials he works with and will carve using stone, ivory, whalebone or antler. His father is Lake Harbour sculptor Ooloopee Killiktee. His wife Annie is a craft artist and sculptor. His daughter Nakashoo, and his son Pitsiula, are both carvers.
